The money stock of a body politic is usually held to be the aggregate amount of currency in circulation plus the total amount of checking and savings deposits in the commercial banks in the body politic. In modern economies, comparatively little of the money stock is in physical form. For example, in December 2010 in the U.S., of the $8853.4 billion in all-encompassing money stock (M2), merely $915.7 billion (approximately 10%) consisted of physical coins and paper money.[43] Digital or electronic money The advent of calculator technology in the latter part of the twentieth century allowed money to be represented digitally. By 1990, in the United States altogether money transferred between its fundamental banking company and commercial message banks was in electronic form. By the 2000s most money existed as digital up-to-dateness in central databases.[44] In 2012, by number of dealing, 20 to 58 percent of minutes were electronic (dependent on body politic).[45]
